Electron microscopic study of human skin cells revealed new observations regarding skin and its constitution. Tight junctions appeared as in continuous sheets of cells. The intercellular contacts were found to consist of numerous junctional strands which are established between cell membranes of neighboring cells which may be from the same layer as well as from other layers. The junctions are not fully developed in the thin sections, but are best observed in freeze fracture preparations. The intercellular contacts are coupled to the cellular surface by a 1-2 nm wide zone formed by an electron-dense material. The intercellular contacts are found in the epidermal basal cells, not all basal cells contain junctional complexes. The ultrastructural observations are discussed in relation to the results of immunological and biochemical studies, to the truth the falsity or one way to the truth the other way to the truth. The truth will no sooner be ascertained than both the possibility and necessity of falsity will have been destroyed. And such destruction will be the result of the very process of believing, for it is in the very nature of all belief to contradict itself at every point. A man may believe this or that but not both at once and believe that he has believed it. Either he has believed that proposition at all, or he has never believed it. In the latter case he does not believe it, and in the former case he does not both believe it and disbelieve it at the same time. Either the one act of believing destroys the whole validity of the other, or the other destroys the whole validity of the one. The justice is that of the person. But what is the nature of justice? It is the quality of being just, which must be defined. But what does it mean to be just? It means that the person is just if the choice of one proposition over another is the choice of the better for the person. But what is the nature of a better for the person? It is the quality of being better for the person.
